Mr. Beecher's Sermon. Mr. Beecher in his sermon last Sunday argued that the modern aphorism of sciencenamely, that the true scientist must love the truth for the truth's sake without regard to its practical benefit, was liable to great misinter pretation and to produce very great error. He admitted that when a man is reasoning to ascertain what the truth is, during the process of reasoning in regard to a physical and sensuous truth he must be able to keep his mind unbiassed. But the truths that crown and radiate in this world are the truths which we call social and moral, and the preacher averred that so far from man's being in a better state to understand a moral truth when his mind is colorless and cool that the highest moral truths cannot be understood by a colorless mind and a cool one; and the mathematician that comes to moral questions with precisely the same principles that are right in mathematics will stumble upon the very threshold, upon the principle that no man can judge in regard to any elements of musical or proportion in art unless he has working and throbbing in his intellect something of that which he has to discern in those arts. Another aphorism was also controverted-namely, that a true scientific spirit is one that has no regard to what becomes of truth in this world, only that it is true. The true scientific philosopher, Mr. Beecher said, is one who believes that while knowledge is indispensable to the welfare of the human race, the welfare of the race is more important than the knowledge itselt; and that the use of all knowing is to make being, and that the creation of manl ood is larger than the crowning of things. There is no more benefit in scientific knowledge that has no relation to the well being of mankind than there is benefit in the brooding clouds of the morning. The arregance of philosophy, therefore, as it stands over religion, is essential y Greek, "in this the Centennial year." Of the whole scheme of advance, the preacher continued, of which in this Centennial year, we are called upon to observe we may be proud. The development of art and science is not to be a few or and regard it an invaluable remedy. It has not failed to give relief in any instance." - [Rev. whole scheme of advance, the preacher contindevelopment of art and science is not to be measured by external comfort, but by a n bler standard than that. But if men are left substantially as they were, if men are no better, purer, finer, it makes no difference if they have cattle on a thousand hills where their ancestors had none; it makes no difference if they live in fine houses where their ancestors lived in small ones or in caves. The growth of the race is to be measured from within. It is true that roads, bridges, canals, railways, shops and warehouses, rightly used, augment those conditions of ease and those elements of power which make mankind better. There is no doubt that men redeem time from the disposition of matter that they may devote it to scientific and intellectual culture. All these things ought to make mankind better, more honest, more truthful, more bountiful, more spiritual. But do they? It is a question worthy of pro found consideration whether what is called the fruit of civilization in our day is not growing the animal man a great deal faster and stronger than it is the spiritual man. And yet the world's advantages are squandered and thrown away if the animal grows taster than the man -if the outside dominates over the inside. In the third place, the pulpit has unconsciously lent itself to this preat danger of making belief more important than life. Not in terms, for any pulpit in the most explicit terms declares that the actual condition of the heart before God is the most important thing. But there is a way of advocating a thing in terms and opposing it in fact. It is more the emphasis than the statement that determines the effect in preaching. If a man shou'd declare in every sermon in the year that God is love, and then go and preach God as just only, his mere statement that God is love would practically perish with the emphasis of the repetition of the disclosure of Divine justice. And men would

THE HOSTILE SIOUX .- The Big Horn expeditions are now fairly on their way to punish the hostile Sioux, and tidings of bloody doings may be momentarily expected. Gen. Crook's and the forces under Gen. Terry have been out warriors under his command. Gen. Crook's wrongs' shows that the blame of the revolt cannot be entirely laid at the door of any "ring" in the Interior Department, but to the whites who invaded the Black Hills in what now appears a vain search for gold. We are at the threshold of a great struggle, and, although it is out of any one's power to avert it now, a false impression as to its leading causes should not be suffered to remain. That "lujuns is pisen" may be an excuse for all that is done to the Sloux. But history will not give much credit to excuses that are selfishness, for where the red man takes a scale the white man takes the land. New York Herald.
